The Six Stages of the Customer Journey in E-Commerce

What is e-commerce, and what are its types

In the past, life was more difficult, meeting daily needs was not easy at all, and it required a lot of effort and fatigue, but the situation now has become completely changed from what it was, as many of the various developments began to dominate and gradually enter the world until it was able to reach what we are Now, after the tremendous technological development, life has become more smooth and comfortable

E-commerce simply refers to the transactions in which individuals and businesses sell or purchase products over the Internet. E-commerce companies started to emerge in the early nineties. In 1992, (Book Stacks Unlimited) was launched to become the first online marketplace for book trading, initially based on phone calls, then in 1994 it turned into a website. Just a year later, Jeff Bezos launched the famous Amazon store, and Pierre Omidyar followed him with the launch of (AuctionWeb), which is known today as eBay.

And only 3 years after the launch of these electronic stores, what we now know as PayPal, an electronic payment system, was considered the miracle that added the remaining link in the chain of the electronic purchase process, which is the remote payment process. Dozens of global websites and services were launched at the beginning of this century, which contributed to making e-commerce what it is today.

As for the types of electronic commerce in terms of the relationship between the customer and the merchant, it is represented by:

Business to Consumer (B2C)

Business to Business (B2B)

Consumer to Consumer (C2C)

What are the most important stages of the e-commerce process

Along with the explosion of information technology in recent years, e-commerce is becoming increasingly popular. The e-commerce process is implemented in almost every company operating in this field. The stages of e-commerce include the following elements

Marketing stage, You may be interested in seeing the most important features of the art of negotiation in marketing and sales

The purpose of marketing is to target potential buyers, and engage them to enter your site by using online ads, email or creating exhibitions. In addition, companies must also create communities (user groups), forums, conversations, or survey customers through surveys to create customer return customer stage

Customers are indispensable for e-commerce companies. However, we also need to distinguish between two types of purchases

Business-to-business buying: The buyer is another business that needs to be bought

Buying goods between customers and businesses: The buyer is usually the individual who pays by credit card and sends home goods

The customer visits the site

Once a customer enters your site, the customer sees several products, a product or a service. You can now start tracking and creating profiles for this customer. Based on this information, you can target the products that this customer is most interested in

This is the crucial and important stage in the stages of e-commerce product display stage

Customers see the product on the website if the item is ordered by category, for easy searching. Once customers are attracted to items for sale or promotions, that's really a potential customer

The stage of adding the product to the basket

On the e-commerce website there is always a shopping cart for customers to shop easily and conveniently. A shopping cart is simply a list of items selected by the buyer, quantity, price, attributes (colors, sizes, etc.) and any other information related to the order

The shopping cart often provides options to clean the cart, delete items, and update quantities

Payment stage

Once the customer has all the items to purchase, he will start the billing process

For the customer-business purchase model, customers usually enter information about shipping and billing addresses

Customers can also add information about greetings, gift packages and other information about affiliated services

Shipping fee stage

Freight charges can be simply understood as charging a full fee or as complex as charging a fee for each item purchased and relating to the part to which the merchandise must be shipped. However, it can be difficult to process international orders that can then be linked to a provider, tracking the goods in transit

Payment stage

After calculating the total value of the items (including tax and shipping) the buyer will provide the payment method

Transaction options will vary

Between customers and businesses usually pay by credit card or post-delivery payment

Between business and business needs all options are available, including orders, quotations and guarantees

For credit cards, there are options for offline or online credit card processing. Online processing on the Internet through the Services is provided by reputable companies

The stage of providing the payment receipt and shipping time

After the order is completed, it may be necessary to send a receipt to the customer. For a business-to-business e-commerce form, the receipt can be a list attached to the order. For customers, the receipt can be a screen reprint of the order or a list sent to the buyer via email. Either way, this process can be easily automated

Request processing stage

If you do not process your credit card automatically, you must first process your financial transactions. Standard business rules govern this step, such as ordering by phone or mail, options can be provided to let customers know the order status, inventory, or item supply status packaging stage

Once there is a valid request, it must be done. This may be the most difficult stage of work. If you are shopping online, there may be difficulties in taking an inventory. If the purchase is made through the service system, there may be problems with the order fulfillment service system charging stage

The final stage of the e-commerce process is shipping goods to customers. Can provide order status to clients. In this case, it may include a number of carriers such as UPS or FedEx for customers to track their shipments

The Six Stages of the Customer Journey in E-Commerce

The e-commerce customer journey includes all the different touch points where the customer interacts with a company, product or brand online. These touch points include marketing, user interfaces, payment, delivery, and the quality of the product itself. By fully understanding your customer journey, it gives online retailers the opportunity to adapt to customer trends and develop a fully tailored service for their customers

Here are the steps that go through the entire ecommerce customer journey and give you the tools to take advantage of this information to grow your business

The first stage of the e-commerce customer journey is brand awareness through marketing or word of mouth. Whether consumers are reaching your product through social media, roadside billboards, Google ads, or email, your message should always be clear, consistent and recognizable consideration

This stage of the e-commerce customer journey revolves around usability and how clearly each product is described. User experience (or user experience) is a vital component of any online store

In the world of e-commerce, competition is fierce, attention span is short and you need to ensure that every customer can navigate your site easily. Just like designing a physical store, the layout of your e-commerce website is very important. Modern customers expect it to be easy to find products in suggested product categories based on search history

Buy

At this point, your customers have already liked your product or service. They loved your brand and were able to easily find the products they wanted. They may have added some extra items to their cart, but it's time to pay now. Similar to the thinking stage, this largely depends on how easy it is for your customers to complete the transaction. Keep the checkout process short and easy to follow, with possible options such as the ability to save card details for future purchases. This is a popular tactic used to encourage customers to come back by making it easier to buy from your site again.

Connecting

Now that the batch has been processed, it's time to get the product to your customer as efficiently as possible. This stage is where you gain the trust of your customers.

After accepting their payment, you are naturally expected to fulfill the end of the deal. It is important to ensure that the delivery process is clearly planned, and that the order is shipped within a short period after purchase.

A good way to help put a customer's mind at ease is to establish information about delivery time, costs, and returns policies from the outset to ensure there is no confusion.

Product/Service

This is another integral part of the e-commerce customer journey and one of the most important stages of e-commerce, and will determine how likely the customer is to use your e-commerce site again. The only way to know if you have a really good product is to ask customers directly.

Send a follow-up mail after delivery and ask if the product met expectations, whether it was as advertised and whether the product quality met the standards. This will ensure lower returns, lower customer inflation and help you develop new products/services for the next stage of your growth.

Fulfillment

One of the most important stages of electronic commerce, without fulfillment, despite achieving a sale, the customer will not buy again. Loyalty is buying from you again and again.

Even in this new era of the global internet-based marketplace, loyalty has remained one of the most valuable aspects of customer retention and growth. It's just as important in e-commerce as your local butcher or convenience store. The final stage of the e-commerce customer journey is the culmination of all the experiences so far

Send your customers a short survey to see how likely they are to recommend your product to others and you can even ask them to review/promote your site on social media if they are happy with the service. Build a trusted brand where your customers become your biggest advocates and watch your sales grow Each stage of the customer journey is an opportunity to interact with customers and ask for feedback
